

Artist Statement

Whether as a response to landscape or in terms of using abstract means to convey the ebb and flow of organic processes and our place in the world in relation to them, all of my work is intended to convey something of our complex relationship to nature, as it exists today. Since that relationship is ever-changing, the use of a language of creative means that moves between accident and control seems to me to replicate the relationship best, in both process and product. I am always hopeful that viewers will find some point of contact in what I do that will replicate this relationship to nature for themselves.

My current project involves an examination of what I am calling Remnants, as analogies for what has been lost when the originating contexts that created the sociocultural connections between objects and the contexts that created them are no longer available, and are instead substituted with an imposed narrative or perspective. Often, a viewer in a museum is confronted by a disembodied fragment of text or architecture, which is helpfully explained by the accompanying text or 'footprint' that provides a paradigm of curatorial practice through which the artifact 'should' be understood. Does this explain what the artifact meant to the original creator, or those who used it? Similar questions can be asked in terms of a sense of place: when confronted by Aboriginal burial mounds when developing a GTA subdivision or a rubble stone foundation surrounded by old lilacs in the Pickering Airport Lands, what is the tension between the narrative perspectives provided by the artifacts themselves verses those that are imposed upon them? These are my current concerns.

Informed by a late Modern interpretation of abstraction, my practice typically moves between painterly and post-painterly approaches to biomorphic forms and abstract interpretations of landscape. In both areas, I have tried to balance the pre-planned with the immediacy of the painting process itself, so that the images created are able to utilize abstraction's ability to convey universal themes as well as variations in interpretation.
